and Sir Humpirey Colquboun, chief of Luss.

While Sir Ian Colquboun is extremely rich, and will not suffer to any extent financially from the burning of Rossdbu, yet no other of his country seats can possess for him the same family associations, and it was there that all the family treasures and relies were preserved. Among them was an old medieval helrioom recovered a few years ago under singular circumstances. A member of the clan, rowing on Loch Lomond, not far from the shore, saw something bright glittering beneath, in the gravel bottom of the lake, the waters of which are wonderfully clear. Bying a good swimmer, he dived for it, and brought up a curiously chased silver box, with the inscription inside:

"Til love thee as my lyffe."
Gazing down again, the swimmer thought he saw another shining object, and on the chance of it, dived again, and brought up the lid of the box, which showed that the owner had been Sir James Colquboun, who was drowned in December, 1873, while returning from the beautiful island of luch Londig, the Colquboun deer preserve, in the lake. The boat was another as a sudden sterm was never seen again, nor the bodies of Sir James and his attendants recovered. I see that the standard works of reference refer to Ardencaple Castle, in Dumbartonshire, as still belonging to Sir lan. This is correct only in a modified form, for he has leased the castle for a large lump sum and for a very long term of years to John Frederick Graham, eldest son and heir of Sir John Graham, of Glasgow, to whom he has accorded the most extensive rights of altering and restoring that ancient and famous pile. It belonged to the Leanoxes at the time when the Duke of Leanox, grandfather and guardian of James VI. of Scotland and James Lof England, made his nome thera, with his royally descended wife, Margaret Douglas, daughter of Margaret Tudor, the sister of hierary VIII. udor, the sister of Henry VIII.
